Animal Obituaries Jasper Burns

Do animal lives matter less than human lives? Day for day, year for year, do wild animals live less eventful or less important lives than human beings? Anyone who has spent an hour trying to kill a fly knows that he values his life just as highly as any human – and is at least as alert and aware of his self-interest. One crude measure of a human life is the obituary. It gives a summary of an individual's experiences, family connections, accomplishments, characteristics, and interests. This book presents a series of imagined but fact-based animal obituaries, most with illustrations, that give a sense of the lives that were lived, and of their value.
